Amazon's Echo has hit the mainstream, and it can now respond to your orders. The Echo and Alexa from Amazon's Echo Dot. It's also the best home assistant Amazon is betting on to set it apart from the cheap clones that will follow. So here's a look at why the Echo is worth your time. Pros: True AI with a human touch In the tech world of voice assistants, there are two main camps: the Siri-esque assistants that work entirely by rules, and the robotic assistants that ignore rules altogether. The Apple Watch is a Siri-esque assistant, able to do tasks like send text messages and tell you the weather. But the Google Assistant makes decisions on a per-request basis, and it's largely true AI that makes it a truly great assistant. Amazon's Echo is somewhere in between; it's got a long list of skills that lets it handle just about any task it can be made to do. The Echo can order you flowers from a local florist, buy you groceries, and even turn down the heat in your home. For an Amazon product with a $200 price tag, the Echo is surprisingly capable of being a smart home manager. Exclusive skills and partnerships Of the two main smart home assistants, Alexa and the Google Assistant, it's Alexa that has a strong line-up of more than two dozen skills that lets it work with other smart devices in your home. The Echo works with the Hue connected lights, in-home video cameras, and even smart home hubs from Samsung and GE. It's also a natural fit for the Philips Hue smart lightbulbs, Aira devices, and Nest thermostats that can all get the Alexa message of the day. Alexa is the best at one task: answering questions. As a question-and-answer assistant, Alexa works best listening for audio cues or talking to people. With the Echo, Alexa can connect your smart home devices and make it so that devices are turned on and off with the wave of a hand. For a long time Amazon  6a5afdab4c
